The Answer Has To Be Atomic as in Simple

Schizophrenia means the separation of the functions of the mind. In “Schizophrenia as an unavoidable result of domestication” I showed how domestication, i.e. inbreeding, leads to schizophrenia and how this and the anti-social personality disorder are one and the same, but separate from the psychopathic mindset.

What I might have pointed out more explicitly, but didn't immediately realize, is that the word schizophrenia and the description a lack of an integral view of reality are synonymous. When the functions of the mind have become separated, this means they aren't integrated. The mind processes and witnesses reality for us. Our reality is in our mind.

Our mind and our reality to us are the same. Our reality may not always be correct, but it is what we witness and what we quite possibly have to endure as long as we live.

People with a schizophrenic mindset have voices in their head, because the two halves of their brain don't have a sufficiently developed connection. Their consciousness uses their brain centers that we normally use for imagination by actively voicing different characters to voice their perceptions and feelings that include doubts and frustrations.

When you have many voices in your head, how do you handle this? What are they?

Essentially the people suffering this condition can handle it in two ways, either by internalizing or externalizing. Internalizing means you say these voices are all you. Externalizing means you say these voices are outside of you. Either way, due to their low level of comprehension, they can't unify the two views.

Their level of comprehension dictates that it has to be simple as in atomic, meaning that they can't accept these voices are their thoughts, but not them themselves. This means that they either look for higher beings that cause for these voices to be in their heads or they choose to manifest themselves, picking voices as one of their characters they now act out.

The voices in their heads are also always protesting each other, meaning that whenever they do anything, it is always considered both right and wrong. This means that their brain punishes them no matter what they do.

This means that a lady may feel she is also a male truck driver that can be bare chested on a public terrace, but other characters in her head protest her doing this, quite possibly shouting, “Titties! Titties!” This will leave them in permanent doubt. In an attempt to control her voices, she assumes their characters, but her own actual character will also protest this.

Their own character in the end will conclude that they don't get it. Schizophrenics, and that as illustrated includes people with multiple personality disorder, which is just another delusion, in the end always establish they don't get it. This will leave them paranoid, lost, and even with all of their voices, terribly lonely because they can't relate, not even in crowds.

These people aren't likeminded, not even with themselves.

The only suggestion I can possibly have for these people in an attempt to offer them a life that doesn't feel like an endless suffering, but is actually quite enjoyable, is to make sure you have a house close to the sea. The sea air, much more so than forest air, boosts your immune system and is greatly relaxing. It calms and appeases the mind.

Making sure that these people get a seaside residency may very well be the only humane option to offer them a life they can actually live outside of the confines of a jail. Jail, when safe, is the kind of reality they can comprehend, but if we want to keep them out of jail and free, the seaside is probably the answer. If this is so, this should be law.

When people desire to die they should have the right to die when there's no room for improvement. It is our duty to find ways outside of these people that do offer improvement that they can immediately witness themselves as a simple answer. Live close to the beach and don't go land inward more than a mile to me seems such an improvement.

All they need is to get off the bus or the train at the beach and smell the sea air. The results are instantaneous. After that, let them decide for themselves.
