

How Wrong Instructions May Lead to Child Sexual Abuse Attempts

Women are frequently taught that if they want to be kept safe, they need to have a husband that keeps them safe. They are taught that having sex is a part of your marriage. This means that in order to be kept safe, they would have to have sex.

The dogma of marriage and sex is a major problem.

Having to have sex to be kept safe is self-contradictory, because some people, men and women, don't want to have sex. If you don't want to have sex, you don't have to. Forcing sex equals rape. In case of these people, marriage equals rape. Therefore marriage and sex are not okay for them. They should have a right to be safe anyway.

Now imagine you have a grown woman that doesn't develop social mental abilities beyond that of a toddler. She's now told that to be kept safe she needs to have a man. She needs to have sex with that man to bind him to herself. That man to her happens to be her own young son that maybe gives her a hand when a dog approaches, reassuring her.

The fact that in this case the child sees it as their mother comforting him isn't relevant to how the mother sees it.

Can you imagine that a mother might offer herself to her son, that mother having the social mental aptitudes of a toddler, because that mother wants to be kept safe? It's not an attack on the young man. When the young man shows he doesn't want it, it's over immediately, but for the law it counts as an attempt at sexual abuse.

Incest like this isn't allowed. Is the mother guilty? No, the dogma is wrong. People should have a right to be safe.

The mother is a toddler that wants to be kept safe. Instead she's forced to live her life in an adult world where she's expected to live out her life as an adult. She can't do that. We're supposed to keep her safe. She acted in duress, meaning she's innocent. Officially she didn't push through. She didn't force sex and did base the final decision on consent.

If we just stick to and accept society's views as the people enforcing the law see them, with them also professing that a woman needs a man to keep her safe, this problem is going to persist. It also directly violates the directive of law enforcement. If a woman needs a man, then what's law enforcement for?

People aren't guilty as they are frequently made out to be by those that judge. Everyone in society is provided with an image that isn't correct by people controlling what we know as science. You can't control science and it doesn't control us. In science we witness. When we witness honestly, the pure evil as the media make some people out to be, doesn't really exist.

Even with the worst of serial killers, their actions may be vile and what we label as evil, but are they themselves? We don't offer them two basic options: (1) being safe and living and letting people live and (2) the option of dying. Society should offer the right to live, safety, and the right to die. Until we do so, the problem and the resulting suffering persists.
